The pro-choice movement wrongly supports the idea that a woman who can freely abort her baby with out any consequences. There are consequences like: 1. A women is not better off. 2. Society is not better off 3. There is no thought of the importance of life.

A woman is not better off after an abortion. Some of the evidence shows that women who have an abortion are more likely to get some forms of cancer. The evidence also shows they suffer from depression and other mental health disorders. They can even die.

The culture change back in 1970s saw the takeoff in abortion, divorce, women going to work, and the decline in religion. This culture change has helped create this argument that abortion denies a woman's choice. This argument assumes that only the women is impacted by an abortion. What about the baby, father and society? Abortion has helped influence the value that children are disposable. This has diminished the value of children and having a family. And the fact that fewer people go to church to hear what Jesus wants for their lives makes the social problems worse. As a result, we see people raising children outside of marriage. Data shows that it is religious families that have more children. Children are experimenting with sex and drugs at younger and younger ages to escape the turmoil in their lives created by the breakdown in the family unit. So, as we can see abortion affects many people beyond just the woman who has the abortion.

Abortion impacts how culture views the value of life. The pro-choice position that it's a women's choice to abort because it's her body assumes the baby and father have no choice in the matter. Pro-choice also assumes that abortion is the best and thus only option. If that innocent life is valued, the Mother has choices like adoption. But when life isn't valued, and some people think it's not a baby yet, then you end up with Planned Parenthood selling aborted baby parts and horrible abortion doctors like Gosnell. Other forms of life are also not valued because of the culture like the lives of older people and people with disabilities.

Many view abortion as a political problem - - it is a cultural problem. Until more people receive the Word of God and understand his wishes for a baby, abortion will continue. The value of human life needs to be understood from God's perspective. A woman doesn't conceive a baby alone by herself and her "choice" to have an abortion not only impacts that innocent baby but the father and her community.
