Letter from our Pastor

Dear Families and Friends of St. Mark's,

Within a few days, our nation will celebrate Thanksgiving. Gratitude is a powerful virtue. Ultimately, it is the heart's recognition of having received God's greatest gifts. In this sense, I would like to share with you all a little story...

*"A young man went to the store to buy some bread. "Thanks for the bread," he said to the clerk. "Don't thank me," replied the clerk. "All I did was keep the bread on the shelf until you bought it. You should really thank the man who brought it here."

*So the young man caught the delivery man going out the door , "Thank you!" he said. "Oh, don't thank me, Sonny, all I did was haul the bread here in my van. You should thank the person who baked it—at the bakery down the street."

*The young man, passing that way, went inside the bakery to personally thank the baker, who replied , "Don't thank me, kid, I merely kneaded the flour, threw it in the oven, and took it out. You should be thanking the one who milled the flour."

*The young man went directly to thank the miller . "Don't thank me, boy," said the miller, "I only ground up the grains of wheat that someone else furnished."

*At that, the young man went on to thank the operator of the local granary who defended himself with : "Don't thank me, I only stored the grain the farmers bring in."

*And so, he went to thank the local wheat farmers who in turn begged off, saying, "We only planted and harvested the seed. You must thank the seeds from which the wheat sprouted."

The young man did just that. He tried thanking the seeds but they explained, “Don’t thank us but all the things that made us grow.” So the young man dutifully thanked the earth and rain and sun. They in turn, responded, “Don’t thank us, young fella, but thank the one who made us.” In the end, the young man entered the Church where Holy Mass was being celebrated, and prayed, “Thank you, O God, for the earth, the rain, the sun, the seed, the growth, the farmers, the granary, the miller, the baker, the delivery man, and the store clerk. But most of all thank You, O Lord, for this feeling of gratitude that has led me here to receive the bread of angels... Amen.”

For us—the point is clear—God’s highest gifts should awaken our deepest gratitude. Thanksgiving is a duty before it’s a feeling. Gratitude is a sign of a healthy heart and is a natural response to faith, which recognizes God’s presence and Providence. And so, it is only right and just that we thank God for everything. In thanking each other for things we are, in actuality, only acknowledging HIM for being the Giver of all good gifts.

With prayers and friendship in Jesus,

Fr. Paul

Letter from our Principal

Dear St. Mark's Families,

Happy Thanksgiving! St. Mark's has so much to be grateful for - amazing, supportive parents, intelligent and kind students, dedicated teachers and staff, benevolent clergy, and an incredible parish community. God is good!

Parking Lot Safety

We are working to improve the overall safety of our parking lot. We implemented a right-turn-only lane onto Cole Road, and cones were placed at the Northview entrance to help maintain an exit lane.

How can you help?

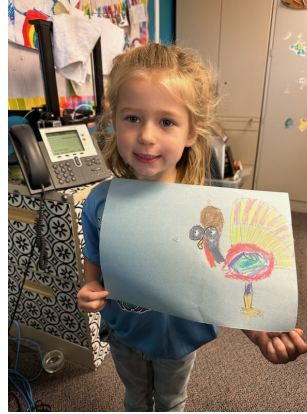

Please, please, please:

- Use the designated crosswalks.
- Do not exit your vehicle when in drop/off pick up lanes.
- Be alert and avoid being on devices while waiting.
- If a crossing guard is not outside, drop students off at the curb OR park your vehicle and walk them across the crosswalk.
- Do not jaywalk across Northview.
- Avoid having conversations with your child's teacher. They need to attend to the safety of all of their students.

On Sunday, November 26th, our 6th graders are hosting the 11:00 am Mass. It would be wonderful to see you all there. A reminder that the week we return from break will be a four-day week. There will be no school on December 1st due to a teacher in-service.

I wish you the happiest Thanksgiving. May you make memories to last a lifetime.

Blessings,
Donna Gordon

Notes from the Counselor

Pulling the tooth of wisdom.

Many youngsters lose much of their personal power during the first few years of life. That's just sad, because what they lose has considerable impact on their productivity as well as the quality of their life in later years. I'm referring to their creative abilities and their ability to feel in control of their destiny. Many loving parents, in their zeal to raise good children, start this extraction process by placing their demands in the wrong place. While we have the right to demand responsible behavior from our children, often this demand is for blind obedience. There's a critical difference between the two.

Parents demand responsible behavior by providing their children with advice and a range of choices that carry consequences. This forces their children to think for themselves. It sends the message that whoever owns the problem can solve it and places a high value on creative thought.

Other parents use threats, intimidation and commands to coerce their children into doing as they are told. They indicate that their way is the only acceptable way. This type of parenting conditions children to believe that others have the answers to their problems. Children in these situations are actually penalized when they think for themselves. They soon learn that thinking does not pay. What happens when children are the subject of parental threats and demands?

1. Children in these situations focus on the wrong kind of power as they grow up. They soon try to obtain power the same way as their parents.
2. Before long, children copy. The way their parents get power mainly through threats, intimidation and force. But this just makes their parents angry. It is very hard on us as adults when someone mirrors our behaviors, especially that behavior we dislike about ourselves.
3. Control is too valuable to a commodity for children to give up without a fight. Unfortunately, the fight for control is not about the ability to think for oneself, but about children stubbornly trying to get their own way.
4. Children learn through their parent's actions that they are not capable of thinking for themselves. This concept is often reinforced after they make a mistake. "See, you should have listened to me," the parent says.

What is worse, children are being trained to listen to their peers when they reach adolescence. This training takes place during the child's first eleven years, when he is in the concrete thinking stage.

By the time children learn to think abstractly, they have already been conditioned to listen to the strong voice outside their head that tells them what to do when they reach adolescence. They no longer want to listen to this voice. A teen might say "I can think for myself." That would indeed be nice. But 11 years of conditioning only leaves the child in a position to listen to another voice from the outside, that of his peers.

My job as a parent.

I believe my assignment as a parent is to take the totally dependent little baby and gradually help him develop into a totally independent adult. I'm usually given 18 years to get the job done. I know of no better way to do this than to make my home as much like the real world as possible.

The real world is a place where people are constantly faced with decisions. A child preparing to live in this world needs lots of practice making these decisions and then living with the consequences. It's way too late to wait until a teenager is 18.

Wise parents start this process early by giving their children choices that have fairly simple consequences. They gradually move on to more complex decisions and consequences. These parents teach their children that they have the power to make their lives pleasant or not. This is known as the development of judgment and wisdom.

This approach also builds strength in children by allowing them to struggle. Recent studies indicate that children who have been denied the right to struggle in their early years are at a high risk for suicide and other self-destructive behavior. Children who are given the opportunity to struggle and overcome adversity learn that they are in control of the quality of their lives and destiny.

Parents who practice giving the kids choices and consequences receive a pleasant surprise. They discover that they actually have more control over their children than the parents who bossed their kids around. Children who are constantly trying to make decisions, especially ones that carry consequences, are often too busy thinking to fight with their parents. They also know that their parents are not trying to extract the tooth of wisdom. (This was from Love and Logic volume 2, #2.)

Give a thought to what control you can share and what decisions you can start making with your kids that allow them to make a mistake while the price is little in elementary school or junior high school. They want to do it right and be "big." Letting them struggle with a problem is healthy.
