In the 24th chapter of The Imitation of Christ, Thomas now brings up the matter of judgement and the punishment due to sin. To be sure, this is an often misunderstood and avoided topic in today's licentious world. Anything goes, anything is tolerated, but Thomas reminds us that God's justice is perfect, as is His knowledge of all things.

I was just having a conversation about purgatory the other day with someone, and I lamented the attitude that I and probably others too often have about it. I too often see it as a safety net that will allow me to live imperfectly in this life because it will be taken care of in my purification. However, it will be far, far harder and longer for us to be purged of sin after this life than to make the efforts to purge it here in this life. Here we still have the unfettered freedom to choose to live differently, while there it will be far different.

"In all things consider the end; how you shall stand before the strict Judge from whom nothing is hidden and who will pronounce judgement in all justice, accepting neither bribes nor excuses. And you who fear even the countenance of an angry man, what answer will you make to the God Who knows all your sins? Why do you not provide for yourself against the Day of Judgment when no man can be excused or defended by another because each will have enough to do to answer for himself? In this life your work is profitable, your tears acceptable, your sighs audible, your sorrow satisfying and purifying.

The patient man goes through a great and salutary purgatory when he grieves more over the malice of one who harms him than for his own injury; when he prays readily for his enemies and forgives offenses from his heart; when he does not hesitate to ask pardon of others; when he is more easily moved to pity than to anger; when he does frequent violence to himself and tries to bring the body into complete subjection to the spirit.

It is better to atone for sin now and to cut away vices than to keep them for purgation in the hereafter. In truth, we deceive ourselves by our ill-advised love of the flesh. What will that fire feed upon but our sins? The more we spare ourselves now and the more we satisfy the flesh, the harder will the reckoning be and the more we keep for the burning.

He who loves God with all his heart does not fear death or punishment or judgement or hell, because perfect love assures access to God. It is no wonder that he who still delights in sin fears death and judgment. It is good, however, that even if love does not as yet restrain you from evil, at least the fear of hell does. The man who casts aside the fear of God cannot continue long in goodness but will quickly fall into the snares of the devil."

Peace to you,
-Fr. Chris
