Faith & Family

REGULAR EXTENDED FAMILY MEALS

I was blown away recently when a friend invited my wife and me to a dinner at his family's ranch just south of Tulsa. The ranch was a true working ranch, beautiful and very well maintained.

What struck me so powerfully was the clubhouse at this ranch. The clubroom was huge and could easily accommodate 100 or more people. A large, fully stocked kitchen adjoined the club room, and there was a sizable living room at one end of the kitchen. The clubhouse was designed to regularly host dinners for my friend's extended family, the great majority of whom lived in the Tulsa area.

On a more modest note, when my wife and I lived in upstate New York and frequently visited our son who was living in Cortland, New York, we were always welcomed at a breakfast which took place every Sunday at the home of my daughter-in-law's relatives. Long discussions were always part of the agenda.

Just this week, I learned that my youngest son and his wife are starting a new tradition of hosting an all-family meal once a month. If everyone came, that would mean feeding 34 people. Of course everyone will pitch in.

There are substantial benefits to extended families gathering for meals on a regular basis. At the top of the list is the awareness that every family member is part of a large network of caring, loving human beings. If extended family members aren't close by, have a designated time of the month when a select group of friends gather for a fellowship meal.
