

Another day, Abe was reading a book when a lady came to buy tea. He measured it out for her and then went back to his book. He later noticed the weights on the scale were wrong and he had not given her enough tea. He quickly measured out the rest of the tea, closed the shop, and went to the lady's house to give her the rest of her tea. Word of Abe's truthfulness spread throughout the town. When the owner of the store died, he owed a lot of money. The two men who should have paid the debt ran away, leaving Abe the responsibility. Technically, Abe did not have to pay the debts, but he decided a good name was important to keep, so he began working in order to pay off the money. The people of the town gave him extra jobs gathering crops, cutting wood, and grinding wheat at a mill so that he could earn money. It took Abe 17 years to pay off the debt, but he never gave up. Abe's truthfulness earned him the nickname, "Honest Abe."
